When you see a handsome street hat that looks like twenty-five dollars, you mustn't at once conclude that the wearer is extravagant. The wings at the front of the crown were colored blue with little flecks of contrasting color here and there, by the use of tube paints and gasoline. The wings were an odd assortment, taken from old hats that had fallen into innocuous desuetude long ago. One was a lavender "has been," another a red wing that the children had used when they played Indian, and another was a white wing that had belonged on an evening hat. The repairing and coloring process had changed them beyond recognition. A strip of gold braid that had formerly adorned a party dress.
